

Abstract

Cytoskeleton and biopolymer networks play an important role in biological systems. The most prevalent of these networks in eucaryotic cells is actin. A bottom up approach is rebuilding the functional modules by a step by step process. Research of these networks has been widely conducted in both theory and experiments. In this report, models including the entropic model and Mikao model, and the mechanical property of these networks active or not are introduced.